After a long and difficult debate, the Senate rejected the bill to extend the farm subsidy programs, which were set to expire at the end of the year. The House, however, had passed a bill amending the existing farm programs to extend them through 1986. After months of negotiations between the two chambers, the Senate finally agreed to extend the programs. The bill, however, did not extend the existing farm programs. Instead, it extended the existing farm programs for one year, while also creating new programs for agriculture. The new programs will provide more support for farmers and encourage them to grow more crops.

Following the extension of the farm programs, the Senate also voted to extend the existing farm programs for one year. The new programs will provide more support for farmers and encourage them to grow more crops. The new programs will also encourage farmers to grow more crops, which will help to reduce the cost of food.

Finally, the Senate also passed a bill to extend the existing farm programs for one year. The new programs will provide more support for farmers and encourage them to grow more crops.
